“Mama Gould was a patient, loving, and supportive woman. She’s the mother of my best friend Alycia, who I met in college. Alycia is headstrong, intelligent, kind (but don’t cross her), and very sarcastic. Her parents raised someone who’s one of the few people I’m close to and proud to have in my life.

Mama Gould was great at cracking a joke that would make Alycia embarrassedly say, “Mom!” She was the kind of person that would share your excitement about achievements and be a reliable shoulder to lean on through your struggles. She’d listen to you vent about your problems and offer solutions, even if you didn’t want them because she’d want to ease your pain. And then when you’d say you didn’t want advice, she’d comfort and be there for you while you let your emotions out.

She was the epitome of hospitality and taught me that you keep offering foods and drinks until a guest says they want something, even if it’s water. And then she’d insist you had something for the road. At least that’s what she did whenever I visited.

Mama Gould also taught me that if you ever have to quickly get the wrinkles out from a delicate material, like your bridesmaid shawl, that you can put it between a cotton sheet and use a steam iron. That way it won’t damage the material.

She was a truly selfless, amazing woman. She had a comforting smile that would reach her eyes and you knew it was genuine. Mama Gould reminds me of one of the best people I’ve known and had the privilege of being raised by, my grandmother. And as religious women, I hope they’ve met somewhere beautiful in the afterlife.
